

My individual contribution to this project was more administrative than development. Which was not unlike what I wanted to do and allowed for a vastly different experience. When working on such a specific project across three people, everyone must take on different roles to avoid stepping on each other's toes. If everybody is doing the same work, then none of us are moving forward. Some of my skills identified in my previous assessment were among the top of those that were developed. Specifically, the teamwork and communication skills which I have always struggled with.

I decided to take on an administrative role not only to step out of the way of the other developers but also to provide a framework to get other work done. I began using some of my rather underutilized skills in design to begin designing our logos and posters, as well as providing frameworks and paperwork for our presentations, slide shows, and other duties. One of the challenges in that was trying to communicate and get information from the group. At times, the hours I operate at are much different than theirs and on top of that with myself still working in person I was split between school and work projects.
